For the things life leaves unfinished.

For when the issue isn't the room — it's the person you used to have to call.

Possibly my favorite service, and the spirit of this company.

The world changed, the process got heavier, and no one can be expected to keep up with every new layer alone. House Calls fills the missing person role in real life: the partner who handled it, the do for everyone eventually — but right now, the need is there for each person I can reach.

Once I know how your home works, it becomes easy for me to help keep it working — home check-ins, tech setup, hands-on home improvements, donation drop-offs, and the practical loose ends that make everyday life easier when someone trusted is paying attention.

Who House Calls is for

For the people who suddenly find themselves handling the parts of home life someone else used to quietly carry.

The bill that used to auto-resolve because your partner handled it. The appliance install that feels different when you're home alone. The digital login that somehow became intimidating overnight. The package, pickup, repair, donation, or appointment that shouldn't be a big deal but suddenly feels heavier than it should.

House Calls exists for the private, practical things people don't always want to say out loud.

The goal is not to make life look perfect. The goal is to make everyday life feel safe, manageable, and less isolating when the normal support system changed.

- Newly divorced
- Recently widowed
- First time living alone
- Partner travels constantly
- Adult children supporting from another city
- Practical aftermath no one stays to help with
- Moments where the original plan stopped working and you still need the day to happen
